

Why WCC whistleblowers don't go to the boss

Description

Peter Schneider

To: AllStaff

3:33 pm

DetailsPS

Dear Staff

I wish to advise that David McMahon, Manager Visitor Economy, tendered his resignation yesterday (Monday), effective immediately.

During his time with Council I understand and acknowledge David made significant contributions to our city's visitor economy, which is a growing and important economic driver for Warrnambool and its future.

When David arrived he had some major challenges and opportunities ahead of him: a new events strategy, the retirement of Fun4Kids, key personnel changes and a major upgrade of Flagstaff Hill being among them.

In particular, David and his team should feel proud of the new Events Strategy. Developed in-house and with the community, it has paved the way for more events to be supported across the entire calendar year.

I would like to thank David for his efforts during his time with Council and wish him well.

Carol Altmann – The Terrier

A REMINDER. Mayor Tony Herbert was on ABC radio yesterday (8/10/19) and pondered why the WCC whistleblowers didn't just wander in and talk to CEO Peter Schneider about their concerns.

Let me answer that question by starting with this text message (pictured).

This message was sent to all Warrnambool City Council staff when former tourism chief David McMahon resigned in mid July.

It was sent by CEO Peter Schneider: the new guy, the one who brought great hopes of a clean slate, a fresh start, a new way of doing things.

In it, the CEO praises Mr McMahon, thanks him for his efforts and wishes him well.

Mr McMahon quit because his gross misuse of ratepayers' money had been exposed publicly here.

Mr McMahon was also a foul-mouthed bully and his behaviour, for which he was never called to account by his superiors, broke a lot of people.

There were people within council who knew about both of these things.

Yet, until July 16, Mr McMahon kept his job; unscathed and intact.

And when he did quit, he was praised by the new man in charge – the boss.

For many council staff, this was gutting.

Perhaps Mr Schneider now regrets this message, but wait, there is more, there always is.

From the minute I published my stories about the credit card abuse, the council has been trying to uncover my sources. They want to flush out and punish anyone who told the truth.

This is happening under Mr Schneider's watch.

And still the Mayor and CEO wonder why nobody is coming to them with their allegations, concerns and fears.

I can sum it up in a word: trust.

And, right now, there is none.

Restoring trust, as Ratepayers Victoria has made clear, is the challenge.

The next few months will be telling.

Category

1. Opinion

Tags

1. ABC radio.
2. David McMahon
3. loyalty
4. message
5. Peter Schneider
6. praise
7. resignation
8. staff
9. text
10. Tony Herbert
11. Warrnambool City Council
12. whistleblowers

Date Created

2019/10/09

Author

carol